Course Description:

Ethics as a subject matter concerns questions about how to live: which actions are permissible, forbidden, required, right and wrong. But are ethical considerations limited to the practical realm? Or, alternatively, do ethical facts constrain not only what we should do, but also what we should believe? Can ethical considerations shape what there is? In the first part of the course, we will explore the ways in which moral considerations might encroach upon the epistemic realm, by asking questions such as: Is it possible to wrong someone by believing bad things about them, even if you do not act on these beliefs? Are epistemic norms governing belief—such as norms governing how much or what kind of evidence is required—sensitive to moral requirements? Could it be morally forbidden to believe what your evidence requires that you believe? In the second part, we will explore the ways in which moral considerations might encroach upon metaethics and metaphysics. Can first order metaethical facts rule out various metaethical positions, such as moral skepticism, or moral error theory? Can they rule in moral realism? More radically still, might ethical facts play a role in determining metaphysical facts—facts about what kinds of things that there are?

The following guest professors will visit the seminar: Renee Bollinger, Robin Dembroff, Sarah Moss, Mark Schroeder, and Alex Worsnip.

The course syllabus will be posted on Blackboard. Please check there for revisions.
